not even the Niti Ayog meeting," he said. "How can a state talk only about central funds and avoid all sorts of accountability? How many MPs of Trinamool Congress held meetings with the central ministers, asking for some development projects for their areas?" he wondered.

Taking a dig at the government's decision to run schemes similar to that of the Centre's, he said: "Each and every central scheme gets a local name here. Real Estate (Regulation and Development) Act (RERA) was promulgated by the Centre, but the West Bengal government notified its own Act, the West Bengal Housing Industry Regulation Act (HIRA). We often see that Atal Mission for Rejuvenation and Urban Transformation (AMRUT), a central project, is written here as AMRUT (a state government project). Apart from these, names of all the central projects were changed and then they were claimed to be the state's projects."

sh on Herbs

mit Agarwal, director, Natural Remedies.
he says on an average a farmer can earn Rs 60,000 per acre by growing herbs, provided there'd assured demand. Natural Remedies said it is doing contract farming of herbs on 1,043 acre land. Patanjali's CEO Charyu Balkrishna says the company is "helping farmers cultivate herbs on 1,000 acre".
kutki, shatavari, and chiyata are on top of his list of best earners. And India has plenty of potential to grow this business, he says, because it is way behind China in production and there's high global and domestic demand.
Big players are getting more involved. In 2017-18, Dabur, under its Bio-Resources development programme, saw an increase of 25% in area under cultivation of medicinal herbs - more than 5,000 acres across 19 states, involving 2,400 farmer families, according to Dabur India CSR head A Sudhakar. Himalaya Drug Company works with over 800 farmers, covering over 3,500 acres, says a company spokesperson.
